Parsha Summary

Shelach Lecha • Send
Numbers 13:1-15:41

One of the most significant sins committed by the generation in the wilderness involves the spies sent to scout out Canaan.

God command Moses to send spies, one from each of the tribes, and to report back on the land and the people there. The spies find grapes so large that a single cluster requires two men to carry it, and they name the location Eschol in honor of the enormous bounty. After forty days of scouting, they return, reporting that the land “does indeed flow with milk and honey.” But they also report that the land is fortified; the Canaanites, strong. In fact, the spies insist that they are too strong, that Israel will not be able to conquer the land. Only Caleb affirms faith in God’s promise of the land.

Hearing the spies’ evaluation, the people burst into tears, saying it would have been better to remain slaves. Joshua and Caleb continue to insist that God can bring about the gift of the land, but the people try to stone them, and only the appearance of God’s presence saves them. God threatens to destroy the people, and to make a new chosen nation out of Moses and his descendants. Moses manages to dissuade God, pleading for pardon on their behalf. God insists that none of the naysayers (nor the Israelites of that generation) will live to enter Eretz Yisrael. God then redirects their steps by way of the Sea of Reeds (the Red Sea). Frantic, and too late, the Israelites gear up and attack the Amalekites (against the instructions of God and Moses), and they are routed at Hormah.

A chapter that provides some laws that will take effect when the children of the wilderness generation enter the land now interrupts the narrative. These laws include the libation accompanying meat sacrifices, the hallah (dough) offering, expiation for unintentional error (either by individuals or the group), the punishment for a man who gathered wood on Shabbat, and the commandment to wear tzitzit (fringes) with a thread of tekhelet (a special blue dye) on the corners of their garments.
